

Brian LeDuc

For Brian, life is a lesson in leadership, and servant leadership is a lifestyle. Brian believes our world is facing complex problems & significant changes, but that supportive, connected, self-aware communities of mobilizers & influencers committed to advocating, supporting, & changing the world with those around them are at the core of preparing a more just, caring & thriving world. He's constantly energized and motivated by smart ideas and engaging people, but needs time to himself to figure out where they fit (yep, he's an introvert!).

After working at colleges and universities large and small teaching and learning with his students, he now spends his time at work consulting with university leaders, foundations, employers, and nonprofits throughout the United States to help them determine ways to help students navigate the pathways to entering the world as engaged, life-long learners.

You're likely to catch him singing his latest rap, pop, or acoustic rock obsession or taking some time for himself on a long run (most recently he ran a marathon in Hawaii and is training for a Ragnar Relay along the Cape in Massachusetts where he grew up). During the week, you might find him hanging out with friends, going to a concert, a ballet, a networking event, learning something new, writing, or kayaking on the Potmac. On the weekend, he's likely exploring somewhere new or out and about in Washington, DC, where he lives.

Homecoming king and a "Mr. RWU" contestant a past life, Brian ran several student organizations in college and could be seen dressed entirely in blue and gold, a hula skirt, or even sporting a Batman costume to help build school spirit and show his Hawk Pride.

Brian earned his master's degree from Texas A&M in Educational Administration with a specialization in student affairs administration in higher education and his bachelor's degree in psychology from Roger Williams University where he serves on the Alumni Board.